Origin and Biblical Context of "Nothing New Under the Sun"

The phrase "nothing new under the sun" appears in the Old Testament book of Ecclesiastes, specifically in Ecclesiastes 1:9. This book is traditionally attributed to Solomon and is part of the Wisdom Literature in the Bible. Ecclesiastes reflects on the meaning of life and human endeavors, often expressing a sense of futility and the cyclical nature of existence. The phrase itself encapsulates the observation that human experiences, achievements, and challenges tend to repeat across generations, and that there is no truly novel event or idea under the sun.

Context Within Ecclesiastes

Ecclesiastes 1:9 states: "What has been will be again, what has been done will be done again; there is nothing new under the sun." This verse is part of a larger passage where the author contemplates the repetitive cycles observed in nature and human history. The "sun" in this phrase symbolizes the earthly realm or life on earth, emphasizing the temporal and repetitive nature of human activities and events.
